CLOSER EXTRACTION, DECREASED COSTS

A VERY important series of experiments is being conducted in the various reduction establishments of Tonopah for the purpose of devising and placing in operation a means for the more economical treatment of ores. It is hoped and expected that the tests will result in settling upon a method to be used by all the companies whereby the extraction will be closer and the cost of treatment reduced.

It was the history of all the great mining camps in the early days that the mines were stripped of their best and most tractable grades of ore, the result being that the slag and tailing dumps were later found to contain values that would pay a small margin of profit on retreatment. This means, of course, rehandling at considerable cost, which could have been obviated if greater care had been exercised originally and the escapement of values had been checked, granted, of course, that the known methods of operation then in use were not brought up to the high degree of efficiency shown at present. It was, however, criminally careless to permit so much amalgam to escape that in after years dredgers were successfully employed rescuing the vagrant treasure from stream beds.

All over the state tailings, low grade dumps and slag are being treated. The mere fact that sweepers make an excellent profit in recovering base and noble metals from the Tonopah mill ponds is proof that the mills of this camp were not securing the highest possible extraction, even though modern machinery and skillful operators were employed. Now that Tonopah has become as settled and sedate in its operations as an eight day clock, it is the plan of the management to reduce costs and gain closer extraction by all means possible that may be supplied by technical knowledge and the most modern and efficient machinery.

WAR HAS HELPED MORE THAN HURT

THE piling up of big trade balances and the fact that the banks have in their vaults three-quarters of a billion dollars in excess of the legal reserves required does not necessarily prove prosperous conditions. Senator Weeks of Massachusetts in his address before the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers, at New London, Conn., September 16, said:

"Nevertheless, business in other channels than those which are furnishing supplies for the war and businesses related to those supplying manufacturers in the automobile business, and some other specialties, is not normal in the United States. I believe it is reasonable and correct to say that the war has started more furnaces and more looms than it has stopped, and, therefore, business would be materially poorer than it is now, and more men out of employment, if it were not for the war."

That the war has to some extent mitigated the damaging effects of the Underwood free trade tariff no one disputes. Neither is there any reason to deny that American business, excepting only the business of importing foreign goods that displace the products of American labor and industry, has been far more helped than hurt by the war. Blood flowing from the greatest human slaughterhouse the world has ever known has fertilized some fields of American business that had been rendered partially barren by free trade. But many other fields of business have not been so fertilized. The entire expansion of American business will not produce its full yield until a protective tariff is once more at work as a fertilizer.

BUCK TO THE RESCUE

J. HOLMAN BUCK is so busy catching up with his publication number that he has been somewhat sequestered of late, but he mourns for his "flock" in Reno that was left unprotected, and is particularly worried now that Rev. Harry Sheldon has departed from that city. Editor Buck is alarmed lest the little "pats" of butter be again slipped into the décolletés of the cabaret entertainers and ice allowed to slip down the "V's" in their backs. He also laments various and diverse practices that may be attempted now that he is no longer on the scene to lend fatherly assistance in time of stress. In a week or two Editor Buck will have caught up with his publication dates and then we will get some real "colony" news again. As a reformer and knight errant to ladies in distress, the publisher of the Western Nevada Miner has both Martin Luther and Don Quixote backed off the boards.
